President Sergio Millian: "We are not participating in the recession"

President Sergio Millian with Donald Trump and Jorge Perez.

Q: Mr. Millian, 2008 was marked as an unstable year for the US economy, as well as for the world economy as a whole and for the Russian economy. How did it affect the US–Russian relationship and the Chamber's work?

A: Despite the economic hardships our Chamber has gained 76 new members last year—to me, it's a clear sign that the interest in investments into the Russian economy and in its bilateral business cooperation is still strong. Participation in global projects regardless of the economic hardships is one of the most reliable ways of dealing with the crisis and facilitating business development. Although currently American investors and entrepreneurs are not as present in the Russian market, the potential for better future outcomes remain very promising.

Due to its convenient geographic location and the diverse team, the Russian-American Chamber of Commerce in the USA can help "build the bridge" between the USA and Russia, and assist business people from both countries in finding each other and establishing successful business relationships. Most staff members of the Chamber come from countries of the former Soviet Union. They hold diplomas from the best universities in their home-countries, have corporate work experience, and therefore, fully understand the specifics of the Russian business mentality, the Russian culture and language. Equally, all of them are familiar with the US business environment, the American market and are fluent in English. This combination of experiences makes the Chamber a truly unique link between the two countries.

In 2009, the Russian-American Chamber of Commerce in the USA will be very busy as we plan to host the trade missions from eight cities from Russia and Belarus, and organize a trade mission to Russia. As well, 2009 will mark a number of global initiatives that the Chamber is facilitating—we arrange the participation of Russian companies in international trade shows and forums. One of these events is the 2nd Atlanta International Environmental Trade Mission, which will take place in Atlanta, GA, in June 8-12.

Lately we have been receiving a lot of requests from the Russian investors interested in purchasing commercial and residential real estate projects, or in investing in the local production of goods and customer service. We have signed formal agreements with the Richard Bowers and Co., The Trump Organization and The Related Group to jointly service the Russian clients' commercial, residential and industrial real estate needs.

The Russian-American Chamber of Commerce is stronger than ever and working every day to promote a healthy global economy by finding business partners, promoting business opportunities and championing investments that make our world a better place to live and work.
